Hi Cathy, reading your post highlighted the important qualities that make project managers and their teams successful. You have clearly shown how adaptability and understanding different personality traits can make a big difference in managing projects.

Essential Traits:

You have identified crucial traits such as leadership skills and good communication, which are important for anyone leading a project. Using personality tests to understand better and manage teams is a great idea that can help in any project.

Emotional Intelligence:

The point you raised about emotional intelligence cannot be overstated. It is wonderful to see such crucial skills for collaboration and problem-solving being recognized for their value in project management.

Recommended Reading:

I came across an article that expands on the ideas you shared. It is called "THE COMPETENCE LEVEL OF PROJECT MANAGERS, AN IMPORTANT INDICATOR IN THE SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT OF ORGANIZATIONS." It drills into the skills project managers need and shows why these are key for an organization's growth over time (Țîțu & Niță, 2023).

Conclusion:

Your contribution has significantly enriched our discussion, sparking enthusiasm about applying these principles to enhance our work. These skills are vital, and I am eager to see how they will be practically implemented in our projects, ensuring personal growth and project success.

All the best!
